Egg Heads

I think I hate eccentric eggheads.

Especially universities who waste our precious government funding doing ultra vital, seriously important, life altering experiments such as the probability of your toast falling buttered side down when you drop it, does a cat think when its playing with a ball, how many breaths do you take in your life time or why are you more likely to sleep on your side if you have brown eyes and went to school in Timbuktu.

Aren't there more important things to find out? Like a cure for Cancer or what Michael Jackson is made of?

Anyway the latest ground breaker from the boffins at the University of Amsterdam is right up there with the stellar work coming out of the Ponds institute. They believe they can now tell if the Mona Lisa was happy or not. Apparently her cryptic half smile has baffled art critics for nearly 5 centuries. Some claim she is not smiling at all, and in fact she is really hiding something more sinister. A vibrating toy up the skirt perhaps? Anyhow Da Vinci's painting has been analysed by a new emotion recognising super Computer and the findings may shock and/or horrify you.

She was 83% happy, 9% disgusted, 6% fearful and 2 % angry.

Sounds like me after sex.

So maybe we now have our answer, and we didn't need a freakin super computer to figure this out, she obviously had just shagged Leo and was kicking back in the after glow, what you can't actually see is the cigarette in her left hand but it is kind of Smokey in the back ground. She may even be still smirking at his small wang at the time of painting? To those who believe its actually a self portrait of Da Vinci himself, my theory still holds true.....what its un heard of for a man to dress in women's clothing and have a little downstairs play?Geniuses are a little left field.

Unbeknownst to you I have installed the same face recognition software on my blog interface and it has come up with the following findings.

After reading this piece you were

55% bemused, 13% flabbergasted, 9% awe, 7% nauseous, 5% gassy, 4% bi-sexual 1% other
